

Leisure of soccer fans as a development factor of subjectness (in period of early adulthood)

A. U. Uzikova

Master of Psychology Department at Saint-Petersburg State University
alterabsence@gmail.com

The problem of personality development reveals in context of leisure activities and personality's ability to self-determination by its qualities as the subject of his own life under the conditions of drastic social changes. Based on the most popular sport in the world leisure activities of soccer fans becomes field of self-realization and self-determination as a active agent of development, activity and life in their early adulthood. The opportunity to display initiative, strength in specific football hooligans and ultras¹ activities and receive supporting from referent group tells soccer fans from young adults without passion of the soccer and football hooliganism in the way of life management (or direction).

Key words: subjectness, characteristics of subject activity, personality development, features of soccer fans leisure, active agent of life.

¹ Ultras are a type of sports fans renowned for their fanatical support and elaborate displays.